While a girl she spent the summers chiefly on the island of Mackinac, in the straits connecting Lakes Huron and Michigan. She frequently accompanied her father on business trips to the shores of Lake Superior, and became thoroughly familiar with a great part of the country which includes the great lakes and the central states.

Miss Woolson had developed into a brilliant woman, and had already shown unusual literary tastes, when her father's death, in 1869, urged her to serious pursuits. She had been brought up as a strict Episcopalian, and had, at this time, pub-lished a number of articles in periodicals of that denomination. After her father's iar publications, commencing with a story in Harper's Monthly for July, 1870, entitled: "The Happy Valley." Her literary field soon extended, and she was an industrious contributor to Harper's and other magazines. She wrote stories, sketches and poems in charming profusion. In 1873 her mother's failing health made necessary a trip to Florida. During five winters she lived with her invalid mother at St. Augustine, and on an island in the St. John's river, their summers being spent in the mountain region of the southern states, and with relatives at Cooperstown. Her mether died in February, 1879, and in the same year Miss Woolson sailed for Eng-lat.d. She came to America but once after that, and then remained but a short time. During her residence in Europe her winters were passed chiefly in Florence, but she lived for long periods in Rome and Sorrento, Venice, Germany and Switzerland. Miss Woolson's first productions in book form were two collections of short tales, published in 1875 and 1880, entitled "Castle Nowhere" and "Rodman, the Keeper," southern sketches. In 1882 she published "Anne." This novel, it was said, occupied her, in the writing, for nearly three years. It placed her at once in the front rank of prose writers. "For the Major" was published in 1883, and was followed by "East Angels" in 1886, and three years later "Jupiter Lights" appeared. Besides these works, Miss Woolson was the author of seven or eight serial stories in the magazines. zines, the principal characters in which are Americans in Europe. "The Front Yard," a story which attracted much attention deals mainly with Italians.

He had entered his carriage and was giving orders to the footman. Marrull had been loitering in front of the prefecture for some time with a friend, but as both were decently dressed the policeman on duty had not suspected them of any evil purpose.

As the footman was about to mount Marrull pushed by him, drew a revolver, and, thrusting his arm through the window, fired twice at Larroca. The governor was struck in the left jaw by the second bullet, but he did not lose his presence of mind. Pushing open the door, he shouted to his coachman: "Arrest that scoundrel." The few pedestrians in the street hasten ed to assist the governor, but before they a few hours in jail, and protested that he intended only to frighten Larroca.
